SOUVENINS. I loved a lady fair of face. A witching girl who made me wise; I was a city drone, but Grace Made me a post with her eyes For Graco was Eweet as sweet could be-To me, at least, divinely fair : And I balieve I loved hor-Soo! This little curl of golden bulr.

This ourl upon her brig has gloamed Beneath the sun's alchemic touch : But I, who stole it, little dream'd That it could ever mean so much: It summons back her levely look, The brow alive with thoughts untold, The blushing laughter, when she shook The sunshine from her looks of gold.

We played a little pleasing game A playful love; we knew not why: I made acrostics on her name, But came to kisses by and by. This sleeping Cupid, red as wine -A quiver here, a spire beyond-She sent me as a Vulentime. And it reminds no we were fond.

And here—a book of tender rhymes. That (for a wonder) time has kept : I read it out a hundred times,. And marked some portions, where we went A foolish volume it may be, Yot o'er it she has laughed and grinved-It says, we were so young, that we Conferred the beauty we perceived.

Well, time passed on Within, without, My brain was hot, my face was fixed; We played our protty folly out, Till I grow-bold and sho grow tired; Till I grew bold and she grew cold, Forgetiul what the years might bring-We quarrelled, she not leath. Behold This tiny, tarnish'd golden ring.

1 bought the ring unknown to Grace, A golden ring my love to crown, And often, looking on her face, Dreamed of a cottage out of town-A little garden, deel to fame; Till, blind with projects small and big, Sure of its object, Love became A gross ambition for a gig!

O, common folly, short and proud! We quarrelied, parted, turning bucks-The gig came never from its cloud, The cottage mover felt a tax. I bade, while brow and bosom burned, A bitter truce to all my joys; She married (well, they say), and learned The knack of rearing girls and boys.

I keep the tokens I have shown, And hold them very dear, in truth-Not for the single loss, I own, But for the general loss of youth; Love dies, but memories renew The heart whose crust is hard and cold; Romeo is young abforty-two. And Juliet can no er be old!
